So, you need to make a resume

Nowadays, resumes are frequently required for the job application process. When you write about your work experience, be sure to include both hard and soft skills that you used at these jobs, as well as quantifiable achievements.

Soft skills are qualities and abilities, like time management, organization, and self-motivation, which are great for any job.

Hard skills are technical skills, like knowing how to use Microsoft Excel, being fluent in a different language, or knowing how to use POS systems.

One of the more difficult parts of writing a resume is figuring out what skills you have, and use on a daily basis. Before making the resume, sit down and think about work, volunteer, and school experiences you have. Reflect on things you have done well in the past and determine what skill you used to complete that project. You can even think about conflicts that you have had at work or school in the past. How did you overcome that conflict and what did you learn? You can pick out skills that you already have that helps you with coming to a solution to that conflict.

Unless you are going into a field where graphic design is a required skill, having a very simplistic design will be completely fine. You can easily find a template to use on Microsoft Word or Canva, which will help you decide how to lay out the information. Make sure that you always have your full name, phone number, and email address clearly visible on the top your resume so that the hiring manager knows how to contact you.
